In contrast to all other major human pathogens, the apicomplexan protozoan Toxoplasma gondii has a wide host range and produces both sexual and asexual life cycles in a variety of warm-blooded vertebrates. This review outlines the characteristics of the parasite and its host range, discusses the systematics of T. gondii, and outlines recent advances in our understanding of the molecular mechanisms of T. gondii invasion and intracellular survival within and/or between hosts. It is suggested that the parasite employs similar mechanisms of adaptation to different hosts, including the likely acquisition of specific protein domains, as has been found in host-specific adaptations to the apicomplexan asexual life cycle. We argue that T. gondii has probably evolved in a co-evolutionary arms race with its hosts, and the definition of species is intimately associated with all living hosts and their absence of disease. In addition to the traditional concept of host range, which depends on animal survival rates and susceptibility to infection, we propose that 'ecological fit' should be the concept of species of T. gondii.A weblog presenting legal analysis pertaining to the application of various US and foreign laws to the conditions in the US.
