

Brush Tips* : Hold down SHIFT and click any of the brush tools to display a set of three dots on the brush bar. Choose the closest dot to create the brush head, choose the middle one for the body, and choose the furthest dot for the tail. Figure 2-4. The Brush panel in Photoshop has a wealth of options. A few of the more useful ones are on the right side of the Brush panel. The Body Size and Pressure controls determine how big and fluffy or thin and sketchy the brushes are. The Feather slider determines how much the brush will blend into the background. The Size Override slider determines whether the brush will `_override_` the selection (change its size and color) or not. You may want to use the Brush Tip Shape control. It determines the shape of the areas on the brush bar that correspond to the curve of the brush. For instance, if you want to use a circular brush, make the Brush Tip Shape Circle. The next group of options, Color control, affects the brush color.

This invention relates generally to the safe and efficient retraction of hands-on equipment or tools from a work surface, and specifically to a co-planar retraction device which permits safe, rapid retraction of a tool from a work surface. In many environments, the need to quickly and efficiently retract a tool from a work surface exists. In the medical field, for example, the need to retract tools, such as a surgical forceps from an incision, exists. In the construction industry, the need to retract power tools, such as drills, saws and staplers, from a work surface exists. It is important that any retraction device act safely, easily and quickly to ensure operator safety and the safety of the tool being retracted. One particular retraction device which has found widespread use is a retractor, which is typically used to retract a surgical forceps from an incision in a patient. Typical retractors, however, are configured with a fixed hole through which a tool, such as a surgical forceps, is inserted to the work surface. Once the retractor is placed into the patient, a surgical forceps is generally inserted through the hole in the retractor. As the operator pushes the tool through the retractor, the retractor is drawn away from the patient and the tool from the work surface. While this system works well for retracting a surgical forceps, it is only limited to one size of tool and does not accommodate for the situation wherein a forceps is too large or too small to be threaded through the retractor. Because surgical forceps are a fairly common tool in the medical field, retractors which are configured to retract a surgical forceps are typically widely available. To avoid the known problem of retractors which do not accommodate for the size of the tool, a retractor which is configured to retract a variety of tools was developed. The prior art retractor is shown and described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,459,992 (Rudnicki), which issued on Jul. 17, 1984. The '992 patent discloses a retractor with a first elongated structure having a first end and a second end, with the first end slidably coupled to the second end, with a second elongated structure slidably positioned in the first elongated structure, and with a first mating structure and a second mating structure coupling the first elongated structure and the second elongated structure together. The first mating structure and the second mating structure are configured such that
