In the field of ophthalmology, it is often necessary to position and hold a sensing device, such as a contact lens or a probe, within an eye. This may be required to obtain data about a patient's eye. For example, various types of data can be collected by placing a probe in a patient's eye and determining various properties of the eye, such as, for example, retinal blood flow, intraocular pressure, retinal thickness, choroidal thickness and the like. Some of these properties can be used to diagnose or treat various eye disorders, such as, for example, glaucoma. Bypass shunts are devices that conduct fluid from an eye to another location, such as a fluid reservoir or a vein, for example. Bypass shunts have been placed in the eyes of patients suffering from glaucoma as a method of treating the glaucoma. It is believed that the shunts provide a benefit to the patient in that the eye is allowed to maintain a normal intraocular pressure (IOP), which helps to preserve the patient's vision. Bypass shunts can be surgically implanted in a patient's eye or inserted transvenously. In the case of surgically implanted shunts, the shunt is surgically placed in the patient's eye. Placement of the bypass shunt requires penetrating the eye to provide access to the patient's eye. This penetration of the patient's eye potentially exposes the patient to the risk of infection. Further, after the bypass shunt is inserted into the eye, it is necessary to hold the bypass shunt in place. This is typically accomplished by providing a suture which attaches the shunt to the eye.

However, because the bypass shunt may be easily displaced from its desired position in the eye when the suture is pulled, it may be necessary to suture the shunt in place a number of times. Repeated attachment and detachment of a shunt over time can cause the tissue at the suture site to break down, thereby resulting in a weak point in the attachment. Additionally, multiple sutures can further complicate the surgery, resulting in increased operative time and increased pain to the patient. For the foregoing reasons, there is a need for a device which is designed to facilitate the placement of a bypass shunt in an eye. There is a further need for such a device that can readily stay in place for the life of the patient. Republican-leaning swing states could be getting less friendly to President
