This is required for an application that we are building. I know we can detect if it's a plain text file by checking if it contains special characters like & or . Is there any way to do the same thing for PDF? A: The short answer is no. There is no standard that defines a PDF file and there are many variations. Even on a document level there are many differences. The only way to determine if a document is actually a PDF file is to open it, see what magic bytes or something it is using to produce it and then look at the file, and determine if it is consistent with a "valid" PDF document. A: You can use the standard PDF open/save dialogs to see what "magic" characters are used to "sign" a file as a PDF and what they mean. If you open a PDF file in Word or any text editor, you'll see that it uses some format specific characters to mark the start of the document. For example: This is an OpenDocument file with ODF extension The letters A-Z denote the different parts of the file. The standard character set is UTF-8, but you can use any encoding you want (like ISO-8859-1). You can use this information to guess if a text file is in this format, by running each letter in a loop through your file and checking if the letter is a part of the "PDF character set". You'll need to decode the string from the file before you can process it. Update To clarify on that paragraph: you don't really need a text editor. The idea is that you can open the file in any
